OVER €1 BILLION DISTRIBUTED TO CLUBS

Teams in UEFA's two main club competitions shared more than €1.1bn in participation and performance-related revenue in 2013/14, with nearly €904m alone for the 32 UEFA Champions League group contenders.

Each club was entitled to a minimum payment for participation in the competition. Additionally, performance bonuses were paid for every win or draw in the group stage and each knockout round reached, while monies from the market pool were divided according to the proportional value of the national TV market allocated to each individual club, among other factors.

Unsurprisingly, eventual winners Real Madrid CF secured the highest payment from the UEFA Champions League, their €57.4m including the standard €8.6m participation bonus, more than €20.5m from the market pool and over €28m in performance bonuses, including €10.5m for their final victory.

By contrast, the second highest earners prior to deductions were Paris Saint-Germain, who exited in the quarter-finals but were due to receive €54.4m, including €33.9m from the market pool as only two French clubs played in the group stage and the other, Olympique de Marseille, departed without a point. With more competition for the Spanish market pool share, Club Atlético de Madrid totalled just over €50m, which included the highest group stage performance bonus of €5.5m (€1m per win and €0.5m per draw).

Also receiving more than €40m were Manchester United FC, Juventus, FC Bayern München, Chelsea FC and FC Barcelona. Their payments were boosted by the knockout round performance bonuses: €3.5m for playing in the last 16, €3.9m for the quarter-finals, €4.9m for the semis, and €6.5m for reaching the final – or €10.5m for winning it.

Even those who did not perform so strongly did well, with no club receiving under the €12.2m received by RSC Anderlecht. Even those teams that did not progress past the three qualifying rounds were rewarded with fixed sums, with extra solidarity bonuses for national champions that missed the play-offs.

The system for the UEFA Europa League is similar, though the sums available are lower, the total pot of €209m including a contribution from the UEFA Champions League revenue pool. The rewards were certainly there for winner Sevilla FC, who received over €14.6m, nearly €4m more than any club in 2012/13.

Sevilla's total was made up of a €1.3m participation bonus, more than €5m from the market pool and over €8m in performance monies, including €5m for winning the final. Runners-up SL Benfica played in the UEFA Champions League group stage, for which they gained more than €15.3m, before adding over €5.2m for their UEFA Europa League run. Most of that total was in performance payments. By contrast Juventus – who joined the competition at the round of 32 with Benfica – took home more than €7m from their run to the semi-finals, over €5m of which was from the market pool for Italy, taking their season's earnings from both competitions to more than €50m.

Even the clubs who had fallen from the UEFA Europa League before the likes of Juventus and Benfica joined were rewarded. Wigan Athletic FC, from England's second tier, ended their debut European campaign in the group stage, and yet made €3.8m. Knockout contenders FC Salzburg and Tottenham Hotspur FC both gained €1.6m alone for winning all six of their group games, with bonuses for taking first place: clubs received €200,000 per win, €100,000 per draw, €400,000 for finishing top and €200,000 for coming second.

Even the lowest payment was nearly €1.5m to GNK Dinamo Zagreb, that sum topped by FC Shakhter Karagandy, the first team from Kazakhstan to play in a major UEFA club competition group stage. ●
